Noble Work

A college assignment to write a paper on a Christian hero, someone in history that we admired, touched a deep interest in me. Wouldn't it be enlightening to study a lesser known person whose quiet faithfulness may not have drawn a spotlight, but whose impact was incalculable?

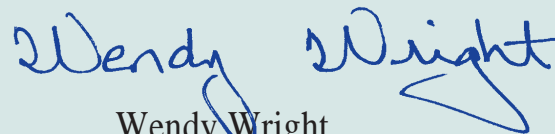

Earlier, I had learned of a helper to a famous evangelist who would retreat under the stage to pray for hours before and while the preacher spoke. Unknown to the thousands who heard the evangelist, he was nonetheless instrumental in their coming to know God.

My professor pointed out there would not be enough information available on someone like this to fill a paper. There may be many dedicated people in history whose efforts profoundly impacted others, yet they remain anonymous, except to the One they serve.

Great leaders inspire us with grand examples of leadership, sacrifice, wisdom and stirring words. But just as impressive are people who extend the noble work of nurturing their family to helping others in their churches, communities, and country. Neighbors who resist porn purveyors protect everyone in society. Moms and dads who urge their congressmen to vote right on moral issues help make our country stronger and safer. Teens who live out Biblical values among peers reach those who may not have learned these truths in their own families.

Many people may reap the benefits of their humble efforts.

These modest servants do it without acclaim or honors. They do it because it is pleasing to God. And that is noble work.
